STORY AT-A-GLANCE

- › We're being urged yet again this year to consider whether getting together with loved ones for Christmas is really worth the risk
- › There are no guarantees that any one of us will see the sun rise tomorrow. In the past, most of us have braved the wild unknown to see our loved ones

Christmas is a time to gather with family, friends and others who have touched our lives deeply. My sincere sympathy to all who are grieving this season.

Judy Mikovits, Ph.D., is a scientist and researcher who's been very vocal about the COVID-19 pandemic, the virus' origins, the proposed "vaccines," and the side effects that people are reporting from the COVID jabs.

In early December 2021, she lost her husband, David Robert Nolde, unexpectedly. In a loving video tribute to him, Mikovits details how he died. Much like King David, her David was "a man after God's own heart," Mikovits says. He had a pedigree of kindness, with a childlike faith and a goal of bringing joy to the world, even when joy seemed impossible, she says.

David had suffered from COPD for four decades, but his condition worsened after he was denied access to essential medications and he had to check in to the local hospital.

When the hospital learned he hadn't gotten the COVID shot, the staff assumed he had COVID, and were planning to treat him as a COVID patient.

"By a miracle of God I was able to get into that hospital just in time," Mikovits says, as they were planning to deliver what she says would have been a deadly treatment of remdesivir and intubation. He was nearing death when she arrived, but within 24 hours after she intervened, he was doing better.

Everyone was joyful for his recovery. The miracle of a man on his death bed literally coming alive, immediately getting better and being the very soul of a "God wins" moment is the memory Mikovits says she wants everyone to hear. "It was always my David's greatest desire to run the race for his Lord and savior, to finish well, and to hear these affirming words, 'Well done my good and faithful servant,'" she says.

David's death didn't have to happen. He didn't have COVID and he didn't die of COVID. Instead, he died when his heart gave out — Mikovits states "the hospital staff had neglected to give him his blood pressure medication."
